Orders in, customers kept informed

Turfware

However the order arrives, it lands in one place, and the customer hears from you at every step.

Your customer doesn't care which system you run. They care whether the turf turns up when you said it would, and whether someone told them if that changed. Turfware is one connected system, so the order the office takes is the one the crew cut and the driver delivers.

How orders come in

Phone, email and the counter

Take the order in the office as a delivery, a pickup, or an in-store sale of stock on hand. New customers can be created from the order without leaving the page.

Your online store

Online orders flow into the same workflow and are re-priced from your Turfware pricing. If the totals match, they confirm themselves.

Quotes

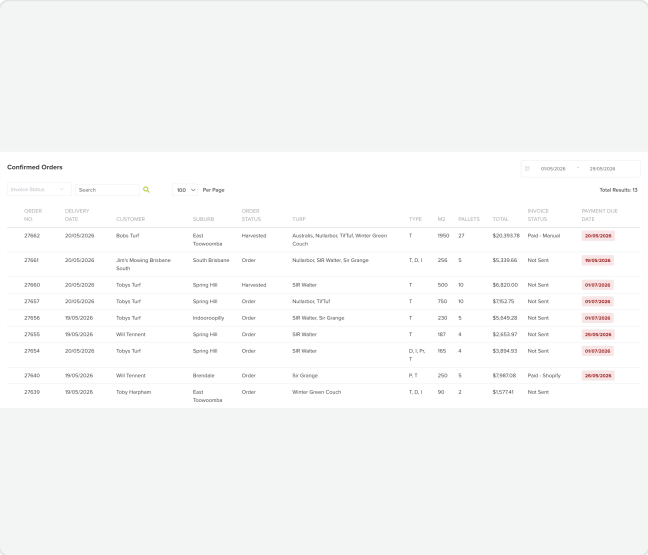

Send a quote with an online link. The customer accepts and pays the deposit, and Turfware creates the order. Or convert it yourself when they say yes.

One order, every product

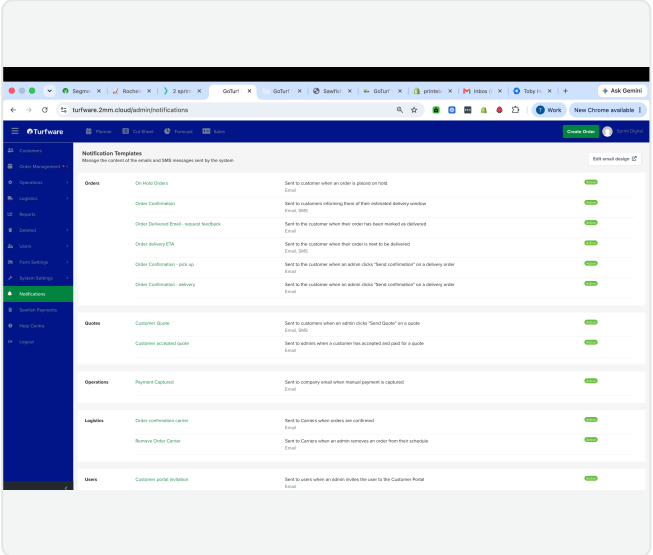

Turf, turf care products, installation and services such as preparation sit on the one order, with one order number.

Messages that go out for you

1. Order confirmation: the customer gets what's coming and the date, from a template you control.
2. Delivery window: once the truck's run is set, one click emails every customer on it their window.
3. On the way: the next customer on the run gets an ETA, by email and SMS.
4. Delivered: the customer gets the photo, the signature and a review button.
5. On hold: if rain or a site delay holds an order, the customer is told.

Orders Confirmed, ready for harvest and delivery.

Notification templates: email, SMS or both, active or off.

Why it matters

- Change the order in the office and the harvester and the driver see it in real time.
- A note from the paddock lands on the order in the office the same way.
- You edit the wording of every message, and switch any of them off.
