Credit control and user access

Turfware

See a customer's account before the turf's cut, and give every user exactly the access they need.

The hardest orders to get paid for are the ones that shouldn't have gone out. Turfware puts the customer's account on the order itself, and can stop an order being confirmed until the payment rules are met.

Customer Account Status at the top of the order.

On every order

Customer Account Status

Credit limit, balance, what's available and what's overdue, with a bar showing how much of the limit is used. It appears as soon as you pick the customer.

Require Payment Before Confirmation

Switch it on and an order can't move from Pending to Confirmed unless it's paid, a payment's been recorded, or the customer is on account and within their credit limit.

Administrator override

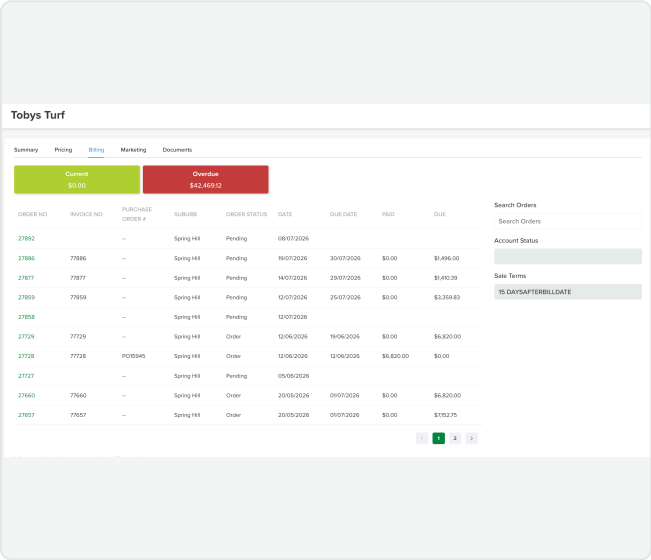

Only an administrator can confirm an unpaid order, and the override is written to the order's Timeline with their name.

Lock an order

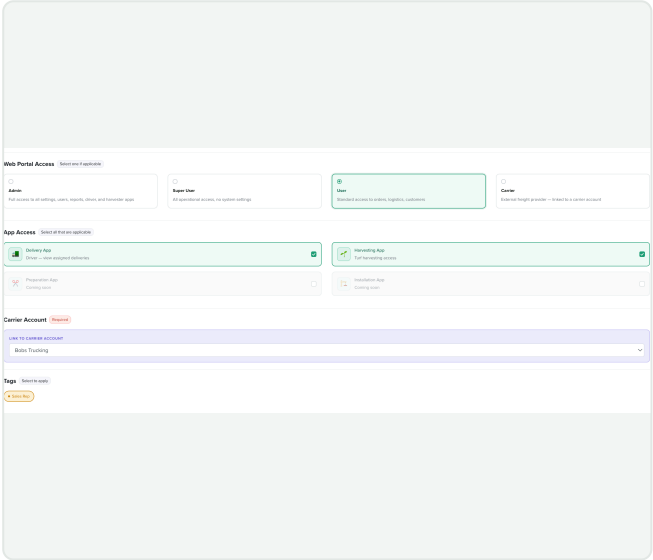

The lock freezes the customer, pricing, delivery and other key fields so they can't be changed by accident.

Who can do what

1. Web portal access: Admin (everything, including settings), Super User (all operational access, no system settings), User (orders, logistics and customers), or Carrier for an outside freight company.
2. App access: tick the Delivery App, the Harvesting App, or both. Someone who only works in the field needs no web access at all.
3. Tags mark a function, such as Sales Rep, without changing access.
4. Only administrators and super users can back-date an order or book a delivery day that's already full. A full-day booking is logged on the order.

A customer's Billing tab: current, overdue and unbilled.

A user record: web access, app access and tags.

Day to day

- The Billing tab shows what a customer owes and what's overdue, order by order.
- Balances follow the invoice in Sawfish, so they match what the customer sees.
- A driver sees their deliveries and nothing else.
